Run

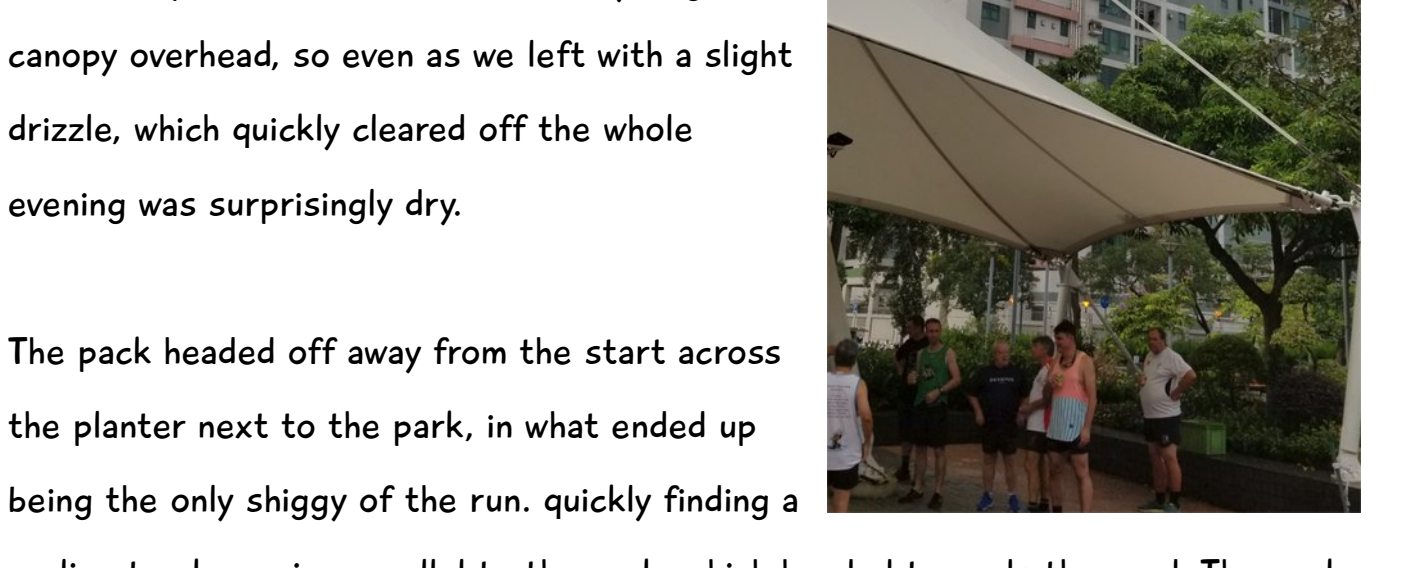

This week, Rene, Mr Chocolate Dick decided to take to pack out to the country, and for a change, a flat bit.

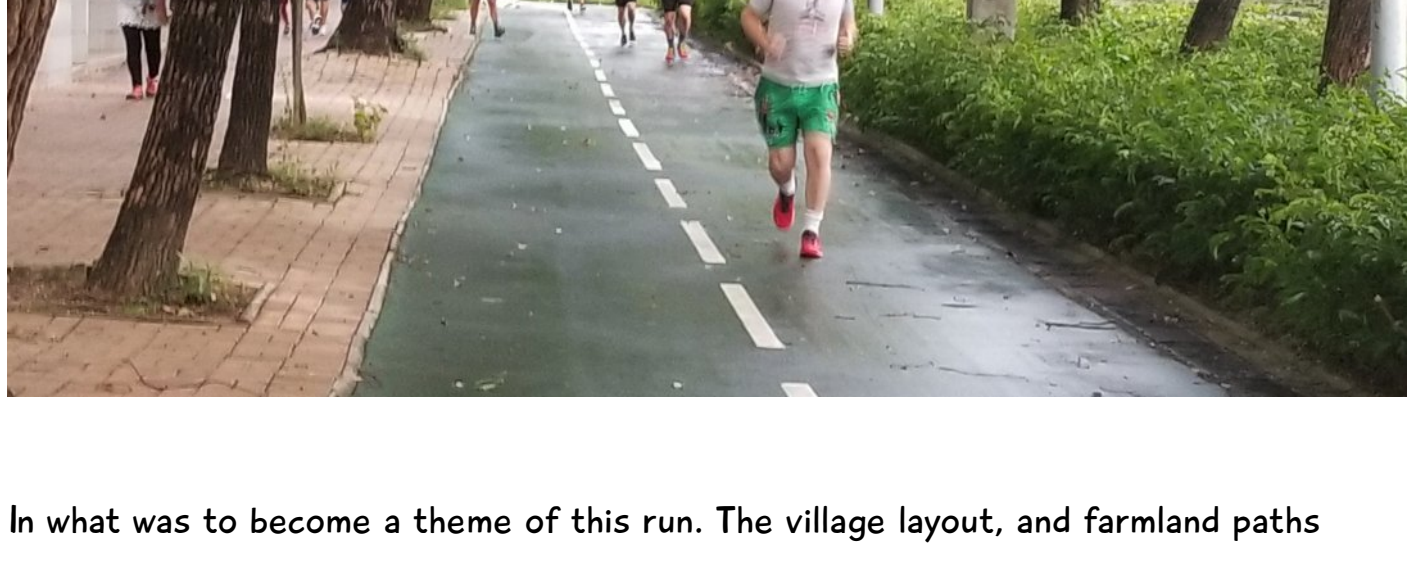

With our esteemed GM taking time off, the hash, just like the government is now running on autopilot. So after a weekend without the smell of tear gas wafting around Hong Kong, the pack headed up north to see if the air was any fresher.

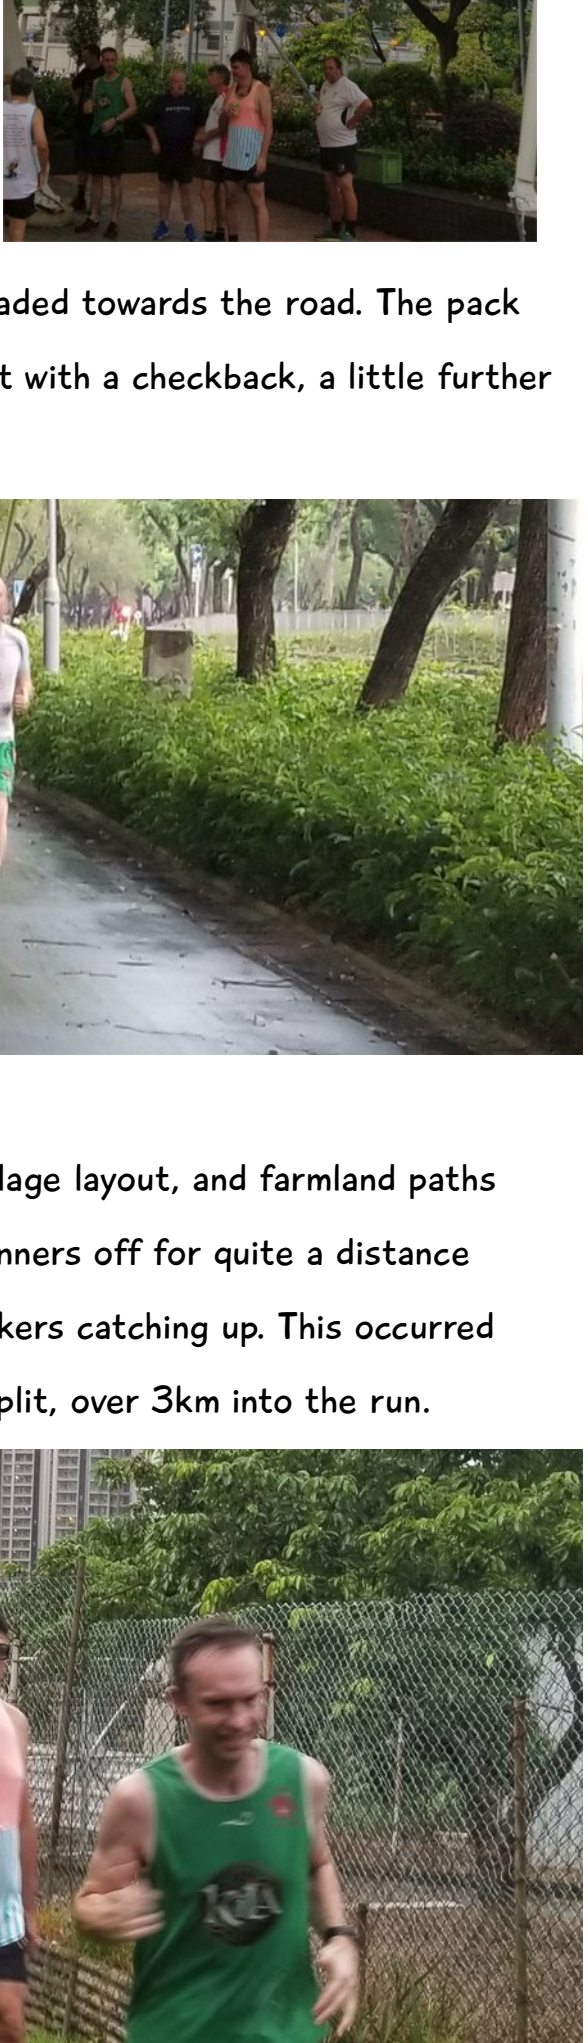

On its way going through one of those torrential downpours as the bus approached Fanling.

Leading to concerns that the trail may have been completely washed away, and we might end up sitting on the bus drinking green ones all evening.

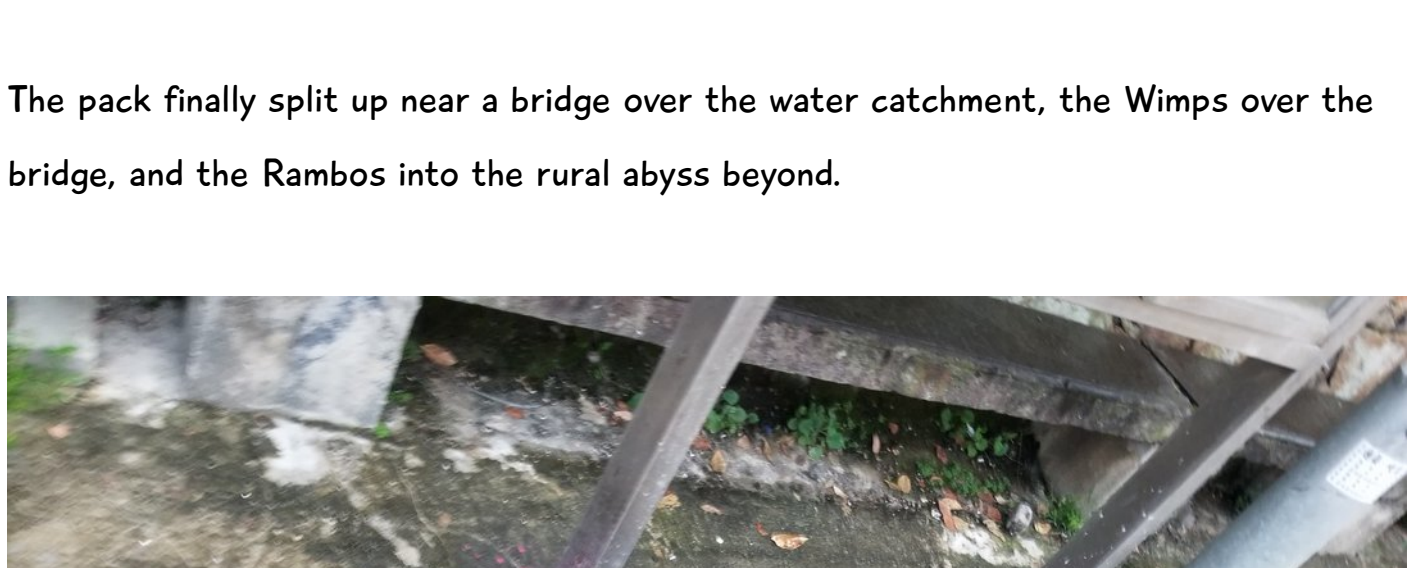

Taking no chances, Rene had set the run, just downstairs from the police married quarters. And as the pack arrived, he commented that the downpour that the bus went through had not appeared over Fanling. So he did not feel the urged to rush round and re-lay the trail.

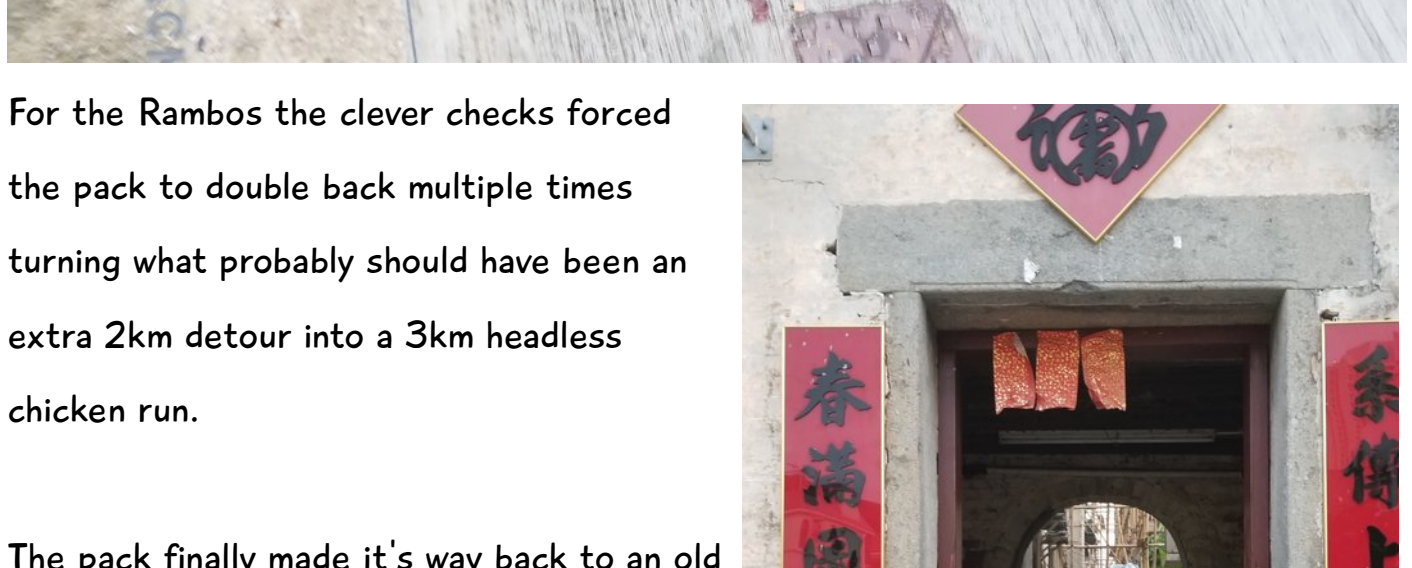

The start point for this run, had a very large canopy overhead, so even as we left with a slight drizzle, which quickly cleared off the whole evening was surprisingly dry.

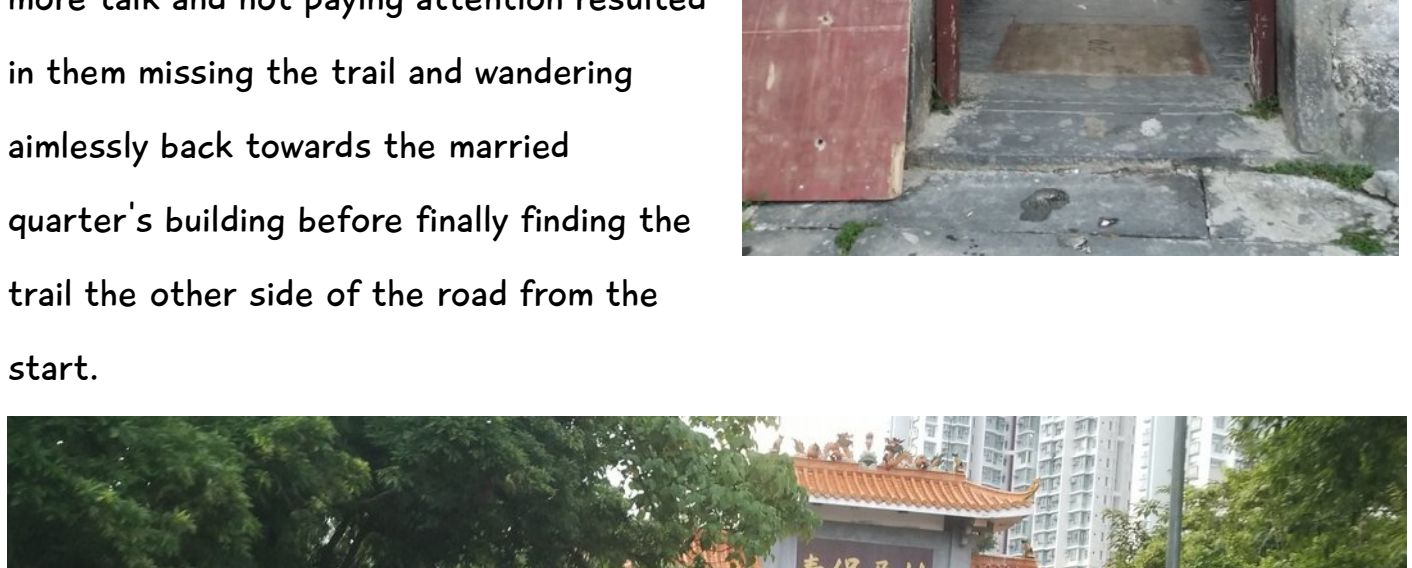

The pack headed off away from the start across the planter next to the park, in what ended up being the only shiggy of the run. quickly finding a cycling track running parallel to the park. which headed towards the road. The pack followed the track around the block, only to be met with a checkback, a little further up.

In what was to become a theme of this run. The village layout, and farmland paths giving plenty of opportunities to send the front runners off for quite a distance before turning back and the back waddlers and walkers catching up. This occurred pretty much all the way until the Rambo's Wimps split, over 3km into the run.

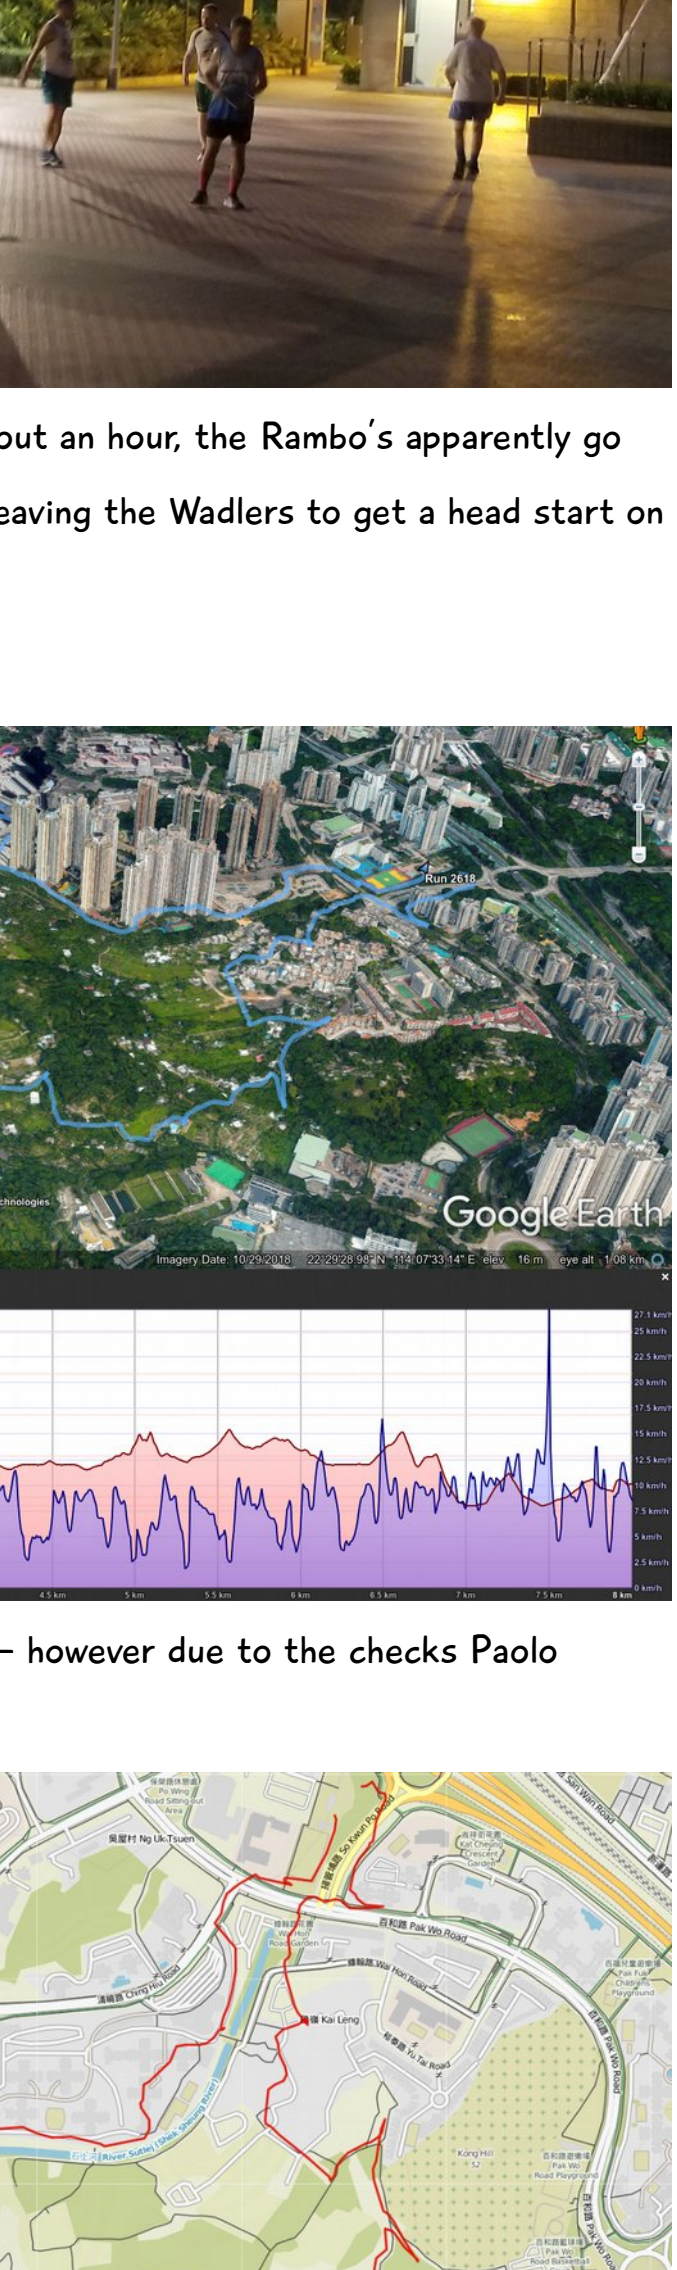

After heading around the side of the village, the trail headed into the farmland. The trail crisscrossed around the farms, occasionally going a bit to close to the rather smelly, heavily manured fields.

The pack finally split up near a bridge over the water catchment, the Wimps over the bridge, and the Rambos into the rural abyss beyond.

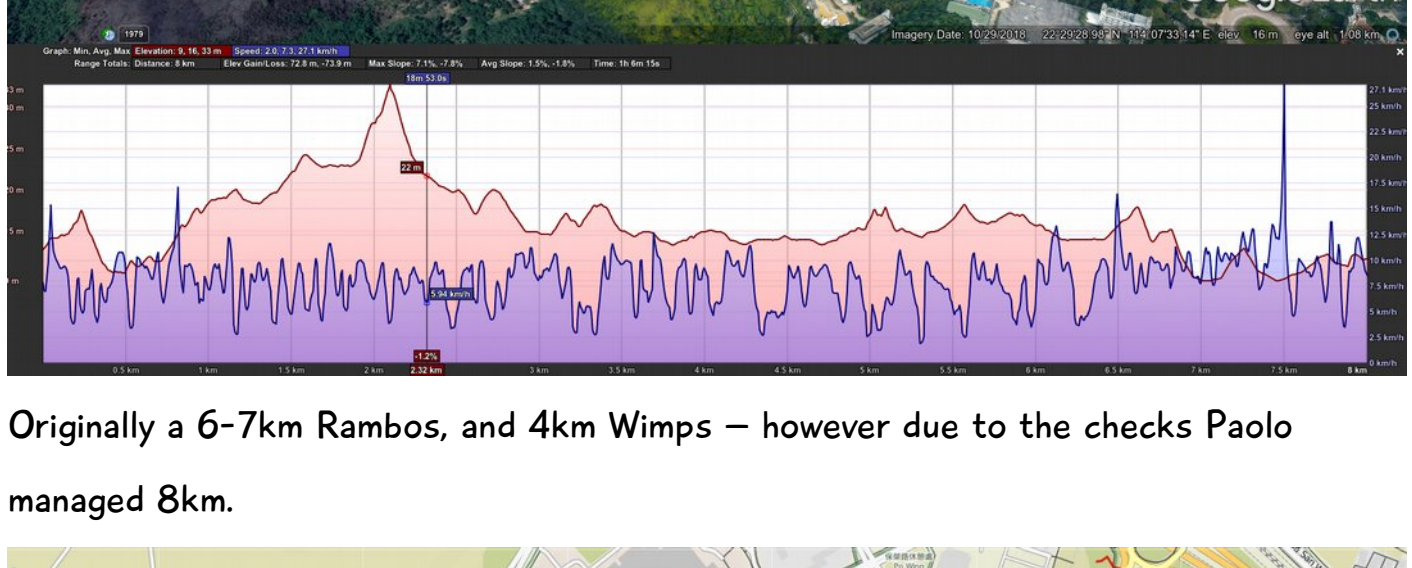

For the Rambos the clever checks forced the pack to double back multiple times turning what probably should have been an extra 2km detour into a 3km headless chicken run.

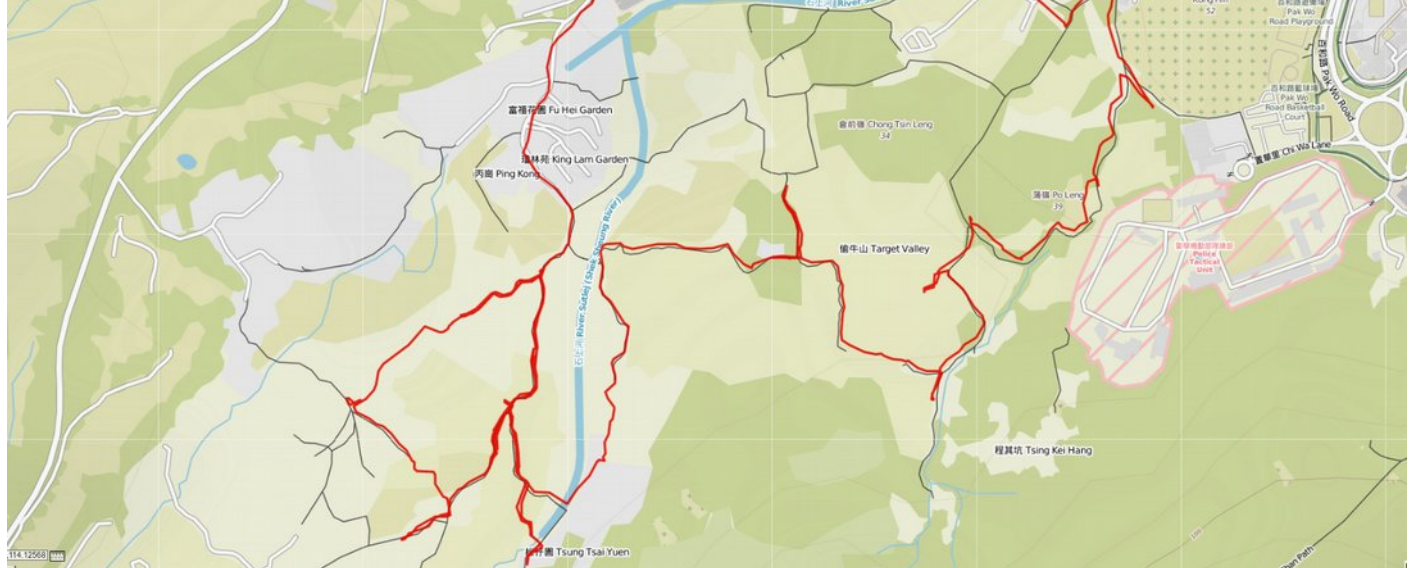

The pack finally made it's way back to an old traditional walled village before returning to the more developed tower blocks of Fanling.

For the front running Wimps, as usually more talk and not paying attention resulted in them missing the trail and wandering aimlessly back towards the married quarter's building before finally finding the trail the other side of the road from the start.

In their infinite wisdom, they nearly started following the out-trail, which crossed very close to the on home next to the football pitch.

The wimps and walkers all came in first, in about an hour, the Rambo's apparently go totally lost came in around 10 minutes later, leaving the Wadlers to get a head start on the green stuff.

GPS Map

Originally a 6-7km Rambos, and 4km Wimps – however due to the checks Paolo managed 8km.

DownDowns

For wasting 5 days with no results at Cricket - the Brits and Aussies

Ex-GM thinking the Scribe was an Australian, invitted him to watch the game last week.. good game considering he didn't give a fuck who won. But this week.. sweet revenge rugby New Zealanders
