Next Week's Run: No. 958 Hares: Ferrier and Stratton

Location: Cricket Club/USD car park if wet, Park view (top of hill) if dry.

On On: Burn's Night with Kilts, bagpipes and Gaelic poetry, it'll probably also snow to complete the authenticity!

Last Week's Run: 957 Chris Simpson/George Harrison (again!)

Very Drunk Engines a railway story by the Rev
S. Criebe.

The engines steamed slowly out of their sheds in Central and hissed lethargically into Victoria Barracks. Several of the engines were not happy about leaving their carriages in the barracks as Policeman Plod might come round on his bike and take their numbers. Eventually the tall controller looked at his watch, saw that it was time for the start, blew his whistle and off puffed all the engines. A couple of the older engines threw snide comments at the hare engines as they left, 'Awful run so far George', 'Typical Simpson cock-up'.

Slowly the engines got into their pace and entered the confusion of the Barracks, up, down and all around they checked and chased and steamed and chuffed. Their wheels spun on the steep slopes, their drivers cursed and swore at all the turns and bends. Poor old Turner the Tank engine was rushing about furiously, 'Where's the trail? Where's the trail?' he'd be puffing as he rushed past all the other engines for the fifth time having made as many mistakes. Then they suddenly emerged onto Kennedy Road, 'easy steaming, easy steaming' hissed Bradley the Boiler as he lumbered up to his 5 miles an hour. Turner the Tank engine roared off with a full head of steam, his whistle blowing merrily, a pity he went so fast as all the other engines took the steps back down into the Barracks and towards the Supreme Court building leaving Turner to disappear.

At the Queens Road junction the scene looked as if an explosion had hit the railway works, there were engines everywhere, over the pedestrian walkway, along Queensway, and didn't they wail! Eventually they all agreed on a route out of the chaos and climbed again the hill towards Kennedy Road. Leeks the Loud engine wasn't happy at this as his boiler lost pressure and his fire faltered 'horrible hills, horrible hills' his funnel fumed.

More confusion at the Kennedy Road, Bowen Drive points allowed the engines to recharge their steam before admitting that the trail probably was up and slowly climbing through the tennis courts to Bowen. It was here the engines could have done with a thinking engine, but in its absence they all charged left and recklessly allowed their cylinders to carry them off at great speed, happy w the level track and easy steaming. It Ferrier the Fast engine who spotted the c back, calling ahead to his fellow eng 'come back you wanking engines, you've through a check back'. The wanking engines ignored his friendly call and carried on. Binnie the Branch line engine also ignored it and went off to play with his connecting rods in private. Back along Bowen steamed the happy engines until Scribe engine spotted an on-on just before some tempting steps, 'check up there Grand engine' he commanded his leader. Overcome with their cleverness they checked upon flour, confident of having beaten the distant pack and hares, until they came to a check back! 'Devious bastards' they agreed and slunk back to the now more distant pack.

Up again they steamed, up and up eventually reaching Magazine Gap Road. Many of the engines were short of coal now, what would they do if the signals pointed them up to the Peak? They all secretly decided they'd short cut down hill and home! But happiness greeted them, the signals pointed down, down and along May Road, where who should they meet but Ganz the Horn engine, strolling homewards ignoring his official duties, much did they hiss at him!

Down at long last, down through the entrails of Central paths, fast did their cylinders throb, happy at the thought of approaching fresh water and new coal. Spread out as they were they all found their way back to the railway works where they recharged their boilers and flushed out their funnels. The tall controller soon cooled down, what with the chill air and icy green water. He addressed the engines and told them of the follies of Simpson the Simple engine and George the Gaelic engine, they being rewarded with extra tanks of cold green water, weren't they happy! Their cylinders could be heard to sing 'cold green piss, cold green piss'.

Slowly the fires in the boilers of all the other engines started to subside and their boilers lost pressure until a reviving spirit chuffed around the gathering 'who's for a curry, who's for a curry?' and off they rattled to the International Curry Terminus. May the Manky engine was looking as if she'd fallen into the clinker pit but several engines still tested their boiler pressures on her. Hot coals (meat, veg and squid) rekindled the engines' dying fires to such an extent that some of them even went on to the Luard Road signal box for a chat to the lady signalman!

"Nurse, were you able to get a semen sample from Mr. Bennett?"

"Bad dog!!"

This hot and dusty cowboy rode in from the mesa, filthy and exhausted. He obviously had had nothing but his horse for company for a couple of weeks and was looking forward to a couple of cold beers in the saloon. Swinging off his horse and hitching it to the rail, the cowboy gave his horse an affectionate slap on the neck. Then he astonished an old cowhand lounging on the porch by moving around to the horse's hindquarters, lifting up its tail, and planting a demure kiss on its asshole.

"What'd you do that for?" asked the cowhand, completely repulsed.

"Chapped lips," said the cowboy, heading for the saloon doors.

"Wait a minute," said the old guy. "Whaddaya mean, chapped lips?"

"Keeps ya from lickin' 'em," explained the cowboy.

"Here's another one for strip-search...."

Why don't bunnies make noise when they screw?
They have cotton balls.

What do a walrus and Tupperware have in common?

They both like a tight seal.

What do you call a dog with no legs?

Nothing. He can't come when you call anyway.

A white guy and a black guy were having an argument as to whether God was white or black. So they booked a flight to the Holy Land, trekked up Mt. Sinai, and shouted their question up toward the sky as loudly as possible.

"I AM WHAT I AM," boomed down the earth-shaking response.

"You see," said the white guy, turning around to his friend triumphantly.

"Whaddaya mean?" asked the black guy. "What does that prove?"

"Listen, if He were black, he would have said, 'I is what I is.'"

If a stork delivers white babies and a crow delivers black babies, what kind of bird delivers no babies?

A swallow.
